A prospective study was undertaken to evaluate the accuracy of the direct method of ventricular shunt placement by comparing the position of the ventricular catheter with that of a ventriculometer or ventriculogram. Ventricular catheters inserted by this method for the placement of ventricular shunts under local anaesthesia were compared with pre-operative ventriculograms obtained in the radiology department. The catheters were placed in the lateral ventricles in 15 patients aged 3-18 years (mean 7 years, 6 months). In 22 instances the ventriculograms showed that catheter position was in the appropriate ventricle, in seven cases it was in the subdural space and in one patient it lay within the cerebral parenchyma. In the radiology department, using a ventricul
