The Disenrollment Demonstration, hearings, and further congressional investigation failed to alleviate public concern, reflecting a close relationship between the many groups that considered the issue. Public opinion made it clear that the administration, Congress, and business groups no longer controlled medical students. Residents fought to reaffirm the medical profession as a separate branch of society, a separation which had been undermined by the AMA's decisions. Fears of the AMA's power to control medical education resurfaced, allowing outside groups to once again influence medical student selection. The AMA underwent a period of self-examination and reevaluation. In June 1932 the AMA held a national meeting of the council, which produced a statement of a position it termed "Professionalism and Medical Education". The AMA determined to do what its members had been unable to do: to oppose further medical education development. The Medical University's capitulation, after such a long struggle, greatly angered many members of the AMA. Their own leadership had abandoned them. The AMA's liberal members looked to the National Association of Medical Officers of Health for leadership. The decade following the conference on medical education was largely one of political inactivity and soul-searching among AMA leaders. The medical profession was changing, and AMA leadership remained mired in old academic theories. John Foster Dulles' Committee on Medical Professionalism, created in 1944, became the focal point of organized AMA efforts to develop a new approach. In 1945 Dulles began a series of studies on "the differences in the philosophy of medicine in public and private practice". Dulles' Committee convinced the AMA that medical professionalism, not education, was the solution to the problems of the medical profession. After the war, the AMA's leadership was willing to consider approaches which were different from the 1847 ideology, and the spirit of the 1932 statement of principles came to dominate AMA thinking. The Federation of American Societies for Experimental Biology (FASEB) emerged from the anti-German
