SE. .Q: Avoiding deadlocks in a distributed systems I want to have a distributed system. From what I know about distributed systems, because I have only read about that, it sounds like (roughly) if every process is executed on another machine, and if process 1 asks for some data from process 2, then I have a conflict between 2 processes, because only one of them can execute in a time. Then when process 2 asks for some data from 1, there will be a collision. Am I right? If I am right, is it possible to avoid deadlock? For example in C, it's possible to check the mtime of the file, and if the file is newer than the last time a process has read/written it, then we don't have any conflict. If I am wrong, am I right with the following processes (D is distributed, but there is a single main process with only 1 thread)? A-----D ||||| B-----D ||| C That is, if process A writes to A_SEM, then it is possible that process B reads the data in A_SEM, but then process A reads the data in A_SEM, and changes the value. If I avoid having 2 writes to the same place at the same time, then I am ok, but when C reads the data in A_SEM, it is possible that there is a collision, because process B might have read it. If I am right, then is there a way to prevent collisions (mainly the the 2 writers might write the same value)? Edit: Thanks for the answer,
