The number of new Bitcoin investors has surged by 700% in the last 18 months Bitcoin (BTC) has bounced back from a violent crash that saw it lose almost $3,000 in just 24 hours. A return to all-time highs seems to be imminent. At the time of writing, the top cryptocurrency is trading at $10,450 – more than $1,000 above the $9,000 low hit earlier this week. According to data from Messari, the number of new Bitcoin investors has surged by 700% in the last 18 months. A digital record-breaker Despite the recent recovery, the number of Bitcoin investors is still nearly five times lower than the record level of $934.5 million set in February of this year. The Bitcoin price has followed a similar trend. It has bounced back from an astonishing $13,909.20 in July, dropping as low as $7,500 in mid-October. Now, the total market cap is just below $220 billion. Even though the number of Bitcoin investors and the market cap have decreased over the last few months, the number of wallets has remained relatively stable. More than half a million wallets have been created since July. Is Bitcoin a bubble? Even though the Bitcoin market cap has decreased considerably in the past few months, the number of Bitcoin transactions has remained stable. As of July, the number of daily Bitcoin transactions was around $8.5 billion. The massive transaction volumes have been the main catalyst behind the current bull run. It seems that Bitcoin is finally returning to its previous levels. However, some believe that the recent price increases have been fuelled by a speculative bubble that is likely to burst. Even though some investors have seen long-term potential in Bitcoin,
