Acute sepsis in U.S. intensive care units: incidence, outcomes, and trends from 1979 to 2000. Increasing attention has been paid to the role of inadequate intensive care unit (ICU) resource allocation in the development of sepsis. The temporal trends in the incidence of and outcomes from sepsis in U.S. ICUs have not

We estimated hospital-wide sepsis rates and ICU-specific rates of severe sepsis and septic shock by using the National Nosocomial Infection Surveillance System data set for 1995 to 2000. We defined sepsis as infection plus systemic response to infection in the presence of an acute organ dysfunction. We defined severe sepsis as sepsis in which the acute organ dysfunction is an acute respiratory or cardiovascular dysfunction. Severe sepsis and septic shock were estimated using methods similar to those applied to hospital-wide

During 1999 to 2000, we estimated that sepsis occurred in 9.5% of U.S. ICUs and was associated with a 1.6% increase in resource use. There was considerable geographic variation in sepsis rates.
