In each case, the intent has been to give the metal an aesthetically pleasing, lustrous finish and/or to change the mechanical properties of the metal, such as the strength, toughness, or ductility. These types of heat-treats have been performed on aluminum, copper, steel, titanium, and cast irons, and have included solution heat-treatment, rapid quenching, solid solution hardening, carburizing, carbonitriding, and carbo-carbonitriding, among others. Heretofore, it has been impossible to apply heat-treatment using vacuum induction hardening to a billet of iron and maintain a coherent, dense iron structure therein. Therefore, each time the metal is to be heat-treated, the molten metal must be re-melted, and the billets re-shaped, to produce an appreciably deformed metal product. This practice is wasteful and economically inefficient.1.
