Ten Popular Blog Networks May Be Profiting From The Shame Of Christian Students Bryan, 17, attended a Christian high school in Texas, where he said his classmates harassed him for being gay and Catholic. When he came out to his principal in January, he said she encouraged him to lie about his sexual orientation to spare himself the bullying that would have ensued. "The principal told me that being gay was wrong and that I should get rid of all of my friends, which really scared me because I didn't want to lose my friends," Bryan wrote in an anonymous letter to the school's board of trustees. Bryan recently left the school, feeling safe enough to speak publicly about his mistreatment. He hoped to prompt new anti-bullying legislation that would go further than federal protections that only ban students from being "harassed" because of their sex, race, disability, or sexual orientation. "I really didn't think that I would make a difference for anyone else because I'm just a student," Bryan told Teen Vogue. "But the way that I talk to people, it really does have an impact on them." The Oklahoma City school system has a non-discrimination policy, but its anti-bullying measures are lacking, Bryan said. And in Texas, a state that recently adopted a law allowing parents to be notified when their elementary school students bring guns to school, lawmakers haven't yet addressed whether the new law prevents elementary schools from teaching about the LGBT community. Headed by David Barton, a political activist with a deep religious background, and Gene Mills, an accountant who attended Baylor University, the Foundation for Moral Law conducts a religion-based legal defense that targets progressive policies. Barton and Mills are focusing on state legislation that would allow parents to know when their elementary school students bring guns to school. These fundamentalist Protestants think that parental consent is an infringement on the right of students to keep and bear arms and that knowing parents' whereabouts would stigmatize and potentially ostracize students who are bullied for being black or Jewish Restricted interaction with novel transmembrane domain peptides of Helicobacter pylori urease C. The urease of Helicobacter pylori is crucial for the ability of H. pylori to colonize the gastric mucosa and is the major cause of peptic ulcer and gastric cancer. Urease consists of three different subunits designated UreA, UreB, and UreC. Characterization of the pathophysiology of the H. pylori infection is largely limited by the absence of transgenic animal models and poor biotechnological options for transient transfection of mammalian cells. Among biotechnological methods, stable transfection of H. pylori is hampered by its inability to survive in vitro. To circumvent this problem, we developed novel epitope tags that are fused to the carboxy- or amino-terminal end of H. pylori urease C or to a single peptide of the urease C transmembrane domain (TM-C). To characterize the constructs, we used real-time quantitative reverse transcriptase polymerase chain reaction (qRT-PCR) to investigate the expression level of urease C. Activity measurements of urea hydrolysis and Western blot analysis demonstrated that the novel epitope tags are properly anchored in the membrane and are suitable for biotechnological studies. Most importantly, we found that specific, time- and dose-dependent interactions between the new epitope tags and the extracellular domain of the appropriate receptor can be established. These constructs therefore offer unique possibilities for the development of infection models and can be used for the elucidation of the pathophysiology of H. pylori infection.

This is usually presented as a rule in economics, and it explains the phenomenon whereby the price of a product is driven down as supply increases and demand decreases. It is also known as the "law of competitive markets." The principle of economics upon which Gresham's Law is based is very intuitive. Before 1800, most citizens were not literate. Consequently, they were prohibited from holding debt, and were prohibited from receiving public money (welfare, pensions, etc.). Since uneducated citizens were not able to escape out of poverty, if they were poor, they were forced to work for the gentry, who were prohibited from lending money to the poor, but were permitted to charge interest on money lent to the poor. In effect, the rich were permitted to practice chattel slavery. The world's first economy was based on the law of supply and demand. Wealth-collecting, debt-collecting creditors were not permitted to make profit from the debtor's labor. To make it illegal for the creditor to have a positive interest rate, the law of supply and demand was applied. Since the creditor was prohibited from
