A hypothesis of the dual mechanism of action for glibenclamide. Glibenclamide (Glib) is the only widely-used drug for the oral treatment of type 2 diabetes. In spite of many years of intensive studies, the mechanism of its action has not been clearly demonstrated. Here we hypothesize a dual mechanism for the antidiabetic effect of Glib. In the first mechanism Glib activates Ca^{2+} entry through channels during fasting periods, followed by the inhibition of insulin-induced membrane-potential hyperpolarization (IPH). Such effects of Glib decrease the free cytosolic Ca^{2+} concentration (Cai), thereby inhibiting the insulin-induced metabolic responses. In the second mechanism Glib does not activate Ca^{2+} entry through channels but increases the membrane permeability to Ca^{2+} ions (PMCA) and inhibits IPH, thereby decreasing the Cai . That is, in the fasting state Glib contributes to the decrease in Cai and releases intracellular Ca^{2+} , but in the postprandial period Glib increases the PMCA, and thereby decreases the Cai without releasing Ca^{2+} . These mechanisms may be the answer to the clinical observation that some patients with type 2 diabetes show a rapid improvement in blood glucose levels after administration of Glib.
