^(?Q: Configuring web sockets in PostgresQL I have a backend server that communicates to Postgres, and also is connected to a client that can interact with the backend server via websockets, so I need to provide security so the backend server cannot interact with the client via websockets. How is it best to accomplish this? Currently, I'm creating a user named websocket for the backend server that can connect to the websocket server and then all other websocket clients are denied access to the database. Is this the best way to go about doing this? It seems like a bit of a security vulnerability. A: Connecting a user to a database opens a lot of permissions. You need to assign privileges to this user so that it has access only to the database you want.
