This is a copy of the original Fortran/Q-Komm -h80 .Treatment of patients with non-small cell lung cancer (NSCLC) who have exhausted their standard treatment options: current status and future directions. Therapy in patients with non-small cell lung cancer (NSCLC) who have previously undergone platinum-based treatment for advanced disease has progressed significantly, with the introduction of new cytotoxic agents and targeted therapies. When selecting an optimal therapy strategy for any given patient, disease stage and prognosis must be taken into account. Platinum-based doublet chemotherapy has improved the life expectancy of patients with NSCLC, but the benefit appears to diminish beyond one year, with a median survival of only approximately 10-12 months. New single-agent chemotherapy active in NSCLC has recently been licensed and represents new options for many patients who have previously received chemotherapy. However, most patients with advanced NSCLC fail to respond to single-agent regimens. Combination chemotherapy is likely to become more important in this setting, and there is now evidence of improved survival with taxanes, biologic agents and other novel therapies in this setting. More than one third of patients with advanced NSCLC now survive for at least 12 months following the diagnosis of advanced disease, indicating that long-term survival is now within reach for many patients. In addition, a number of novel active therapies have been approved in recent years and have resulted in greater survival for patients with advanced disease. New immunologic approaches such as anti-programmed cell death protein 1 (PD-1) agents and other checkpoint inhibitors are now an important component of therapy in patients with NSCLC who have had prior platinum-based therapy, both for the treatment of patients with advanced disease and for the further treatment of patients with NSCLC who have previously received one or more anti-PD-1 agent. nurses play a key role in the care of patients with advanced NSCLC, and can make a positive difference to the lives of many patients through proper identification of this diagnosis and through careful documentation of the impact of disease and of treatment on patient quality of life.
