Physical abuse in pregnancy, early child development and cognitive development: analysis of longitudinal data. To determine the extent of physical abuse by parents during pregnancy and the impact of this abuse on infants and toddlers, 202 families were observed at 3, 6 and 9 months of the infant's life. Mothers and infants were observed at home and video-recorded during free play. Maternal self-report and a parent observer provided information about abuse and infant development. Results indicated that nearly one-quarter of the mothers physically abused their infants during the first 6 months of life. Prevalence rates were similar for mothers who were and were not currently in the process of getting divorced. In addition, physical abuse during pregnancy had some effects on infant development and mothers' behaviors. Regression analyses indicated that the relationship between physical abuse during pregnancy and behavior varied depending on the nature and severity of the abuse. There were strong relations between the frequency of physical abuse during pregnancy and less secure attachment with mother, and the frequency of physical abuse during pregnancy and less protective behaviors with the infant. There was a marginal effect of physical abuse during pregnancy on the quality of the infant's attachment to mother, however.
