The present invention relates to a process and apparatus for the continuous casting of steel in an upright twin roll caster. In a continuous casting process, molten steel is generally poured through a tundish into a mould. The mould may consist of two or more components that form a shell into which the molten steel is poured. A mould casting process may also include molten steel being poured through the mould into a chill plate. The chill plate is a cooled surface over which the molten steel is cast into the mould, the chill plate which is also cooled is used to shape the casting and may also be cooled further to form the casting. Continuous casting typically involves the casting of steel in a twin roll caster. In a twin roll caster, liquid steel is introduced between a pair of counter rotating horizontal casting rolls which are internally cooled so that steel cast on the rotating roll is solidified to form a slab or steel strip. The term xe2x80x9cseamless steel stripxe2x80x9d will hereinafter be used to refer to steel strip which is continuously cast and not cut to size on exit from the twin roll caster. xe2x80x9cCut to sizexe2x80x9d as used herein will refer to steel strip which is cast, hot rolled and cut into a given length. At the exit from the twin roll caster, the strip is delivered between a series of rollers edd6d56e20
