I have a situation where my view model contains an object with no Id property (this is just a simplification, in the full context the object does have an Id but it's not the Id we want in this example). I'd like to use @Html.HiddenFor(model => model.Id) in my form - but I get an error which says the ID property is required for object xyz (which, of course, has no Id). Is there any way to get this form field to be generated, it can't be the only form field with the same name? A: You can use the EditorFor method to render a template for an anonymous object. @Html.EditorFor(model => model) This will make sure that the form is populated with fields for every property on the model. A: You could implement the model binder to parse out the properties into the form collection and set them to values in the Request. It's a little ugly, but it should work: public class HiddenValueModelBinder : DefaultModelBinder { protected override void BindModel(ControllerContext controllerContext, ModelBindingContext bindingContext) { var context = bindingContext.HttpContext; var valueProvider = bindingContext.ValueProvider; var model = bindingContext.Model as MyModel; var value = valueProvider.GetValue(model); if (value != null) { bindingContext.ModelState.SetModelValue(bindingContext.ModelName, value); bindingContext.ModelState.SetModelValue("Name", value); binding
