At least not without negative impacts. Given that electricity is (usually) a negative force on most radio frequencies, using visible power lines as antennae is a bad idea. Visible power lines: 1.88 Gigahertz Non-visible power lines: 470 Kilohertz Most non-visible power lines are on a higher frequency than 470 Kilohertz. That's why visible power lines are the exception, not the rule. So, if we take the chance of using visible power lines as antennas, we can only do so when there is no other option. This is usually the case. For example, when you don't have a directional antenna, and your signals are a bit stronger than your noise floor, the power lines are a very useful, low-cost option. But we do have other options. And if we don't have the chance to use visible power lines, we can use something else. There are two ways to do that, and I'll describe them here. Check out these similar tricks too: Low-cost antennas: Can you get better results with this one? You can use other non-visible power lines as antennas. However, that adds cost, and is often inconvenient. In addition, some devices already require a visible power line or tower. So, before we can use anything else, we need to examine our signals. Many people use their power lines as antennas without really thinking about it. For example, some people have a (usually) directional antenna, and the signals are too weak to work otherwise. So, they use the nearest power line as an antenna. The problem with this is that, just as mentioned above, the electricity is very powerful at that frequency. You also need to check to make sure you have a signal, and that it doesn't interfere with your signal. You may get lucky and find the
