The Zinga (Barefoot) Monks of Burkina Faso and Why They Live in the Desert For centuries, the Zinga Monks have been following a life of simplicity and prayer. They live in a small oasis in the northern Sahara desert where they don't have electricity or running water. One of their main chores is to care for the animals and the plants that surround them. This is why the monks are called the Barefoot Monks. The Zinga Monks Spend Their Days In Prayer For centuries the Zinga Monks have lived in the Sahara desert following their beliefs of simplicity and prayer. There are many things that make these people stand out in the desert. For example, they don't have running water and also they live without electricity and they generally don't have much. However, despite the hardships that they face, this sect of people still have their faith and religion intact. They live by certain set of rules and they cannot seek any medical attention. The Zinga Monks are a Faithful Sect Of People The Zinga Monks believes that they will be happy when they embrace their naked life. For them, the nearest one to God is a life without clothes or shoes and this is why they don't wear shoes. The group of Zinga Monks is led by a priest who teaches them about their religion. The Monks Pray Every Morning Every morning the Zinga Monks start their day by praying. For these people, prayer is a necessary part of their lives. It's their religion and for them prayer is a lifestyle. The priest who leads the group of monks tells them that their prayer is a ceremony. They perform their prayers by kneeling down and putting their heads on the ground. The monks Pray Outside These people worship God as a group of people. Therefore, they gather in an open space called the Prayer Circle. The act of praying for these people is like a ceremony. They are grateful to the Lord God and they ask him to bless them. They ask for his help and to guide them through their daily life. The Zinga Monks Drive Their Huts With A Stick Although the Zinga Monks live in an isolated area, there are roads that lead to their oasis. The people who drive
