The visible to near infrared photoluminescence (PL) of CdS nanocrystals (NCs) has been studied by time resolved spectroscopy and time resolved pump-probe. The lifetime of the excited states, which show PL is longer than any previously reported observation, provides evidence for long carrier trapping times. The excitation density-dependent PL intensity reveals a four-level energy transfer behavior between donor and acceptor NCs in colloidal CdS NCs. The PL emission of CdS NCs is dominated by a feature arising from the exciton of the ZnS shell. The hole mobilities of CdS NCs are determined by the time resolved PL and single NC electroluminescence measurements under pulsed excitation. The detected hole mobility is 120 cm² V⁻¹ s⁻¹, which is comparable to that of pristine CdS nanorods and other CdSe NCs. Photoluminescence imaging and ultrafast time-resolved measurement of photoinduced bipolar resistivity have been made in order to investigate the impact of NC shape on carrier transport. The bipolar resistivity of CdS NCs is easily modulated by changing the shape of NCs by simply varying the reaction time of the hydrazine 3da54e8ca3
