The present invention relates to an imaging system for infrared radiation, in particular to a system which can be used in connection with aircraft, ground vehicles, and stationary stands, and which contains at least one detector which senses the radiation intensity of the infrared radiation. Imaging systems, in which a detector senses the radiation intensity of the infrared radiation received from a radiating object, are known per se. Such systems are frequently used in connection with devices for finding, tracking, and aiming, aircraft. In the art it is known for example to use the detectors on infrared signal transmitted from remote receivers mounted in the fuselage of an aircraft, to detect infrared radiation from remote bodies, and to determine the position of the aircraft and the azimuth and elevation angle of the body, by triangulation. An infrared beam from a remote transmitter, beamed in the direction of a detector and modulated as a function
