How could Howard know what was going to happen to Ojaka until the events in the dream were already happening? This is the major error of the causality fallacy. If some things are experienced but do not happen then they must have caused the experience in the past. Howard argues that his dreams gave him this idea in this way: "But since no such experience was ever in the past, and no trace of it can be witnessed, it is plain that a dream-suggestion of such a thing must have actually taken place in the future. No reason can be given why experience in the future, which is not experienced, should suggest an event which has never yet existed. The assertion of such a relation between the two past events seems, therefore, to be as impossible as the assertion of a direct relation between a past event and the present of which it is the image." But this is precisely what the correlation fallacy is. The correlation fallacy attempts to establish a relationship between two things by observing a relationship between their effects. If I observe that I have a pain in my toe, this observation tells me nothing about the pain, the toe, and their past states. The fact that the past states of the toe and the pain have nothing to do with each other tells me very little about the toe and very little about the pain. Howard concludes his paper by the following: "In other words, all the facts proved to the contrary, the universe, as the complete reality, involves the inevitable fact of a beginning. To which of course there is no reply." But the only possible response is this: "Perhaps there is a beginning, but there is no necessarily a beginning". For this argument, see. But this is a necessity argument. Note that this argument is based upon the necessary existence of the universe. Certainly, there is no logical contradiction to think that the universe can exist but still be created without a necessity. So there is no logical inconsistency to think that there is a necessarily created
