Previous studies have investigated the biomechanics of the lower limb in people with painful metatarsalgia, yet none have assessed the effect of posture and the forefoot movement on the evaluated structure. The objective of this study is to determine the differences in the positions of the metatarsophalangeal (MTP) joints and plantar pressures between participants with high and normal metatarsalgia. A total of fifty-two male and female adults participated in this study (age range of 18-63 years; weight range of 60-126 kg). Thirty-four participants had previous diagnosis of high metatarsalgia while 18 were classified as normal. The three-dimensional (3D) foot position was measured using infrared imaging. The range of the MTP joints and the plantar pressures were assessed in the rest standing posture and while the participant performed submaximal toe-raising movements with the forefoot in the sagittal and frontal plane.
